Why a book slows down · Questions 1–6

A force is a push or a pull. When a moving book touches a surface, friction acts in the opposite direction to its movement. Friction makes the book slow down. A smooth surface such as waxed paper usually creates less friction than towel. With very little friction, an object travels farther before stopping. The amount of friction also depends on how firmly two surfaces press together. Friction is useful too: it helps shoes grip the ground and bicycle brakes stop wheels. Without enough friction, people could slip and tyres could slide. Too much friction can be unhelpful because moving parts may heat up or wear away, so machines sometimes use oil to reduce it.

1 Why a book slows down: What makes the moving book slow down?

- A gravity pulling it sideways B light warming the surface
C sound pushing it forward D friction acting against its movement

2 Why a book slows down: What would most likely happen if there were very little friction?

- A The book would change colour. B The book would stop at once.
C The book would travel farther before stopping. D The book would become heavier.

Ruby's guide to three kinds of fitness · Questions 13–18

During a health lesson at the hall, Ruby's class learned that a sedentary person spends long periods sitting and moving very little. Regular activity helps the heart, muscles and joints. Review: Hidden Habitats · Questions 30–34Hidden Habitats by Amelia Ward

This information book contains surprising facts, labelled pictures and short explanations. Its chapters move from simple examples to less familiar ones. The captions make the pictures easy to understand, and small fact boxes add details without interrupting the main explanation. The index is useful for finding a topic again.
