Why a button slows down · Questions 1–6

A force is a push or a pull. When a moving button touches a surface, friction acts in the opposite direction to its movement. Friction makes the button slow down. A smooth surface such as glass sheet usually creates less friction than carpet. With very little friction, an object travels farther before stopping. The amount of friction also depends on how firmly two surfaces press together. Friction is useful too: it helps shoes grip the ground and bicycle brakes stop wheels. Without enough friction, people could slip and tyres could slide. Too much friction can be unhelpful because moving parts may heat up or wear away, so machines sometimes use oil to reduce it.

1 Why a button slows down: What makes the moving button slow down?

- A light warming the surface B sound pushing it forward
C friction acting against its movement D gravity pulling it sideways

2 Why a button slows down: What would most likely happen if there were very little friction?

- A The button would stop at once. B The button would travel farther before stopping.
C The button would become heavier. D The button would change colour.

3 Why a button slows down: Mark each statement True or False.

Review: Great Garden Mysteries · Questions 30–34Great Garden Mysteries by Omar Reed

This information book contains surprising facts, labelled pictures and short explanations. Its chapters move from simple examples to less familiar ones. The opening chapter gives readers enough background to understand the later examples.
