Why a toy car slows down · Questions 1–6

A force is a push or a pull. When a moving toy car touches a surface, friction acts in the opposite direction to its movement. Friction makes the toy car slow down. A smooth surface such as smooth plastic usually creates less friction than rough carpet. With very little friction, an object travels farther before stopping. The amount of friction also depends on how firmly two surfaces press together. Friction is useful too: it helps shoes grip the ground and bicycle brakes stop wheels. Without enough friction, people could slip and tyres could slide. Too much friction can be unhelpful because moving parts may heat up or wear away, so machines sometimes use oil to reduce it.

1 Why a toy car slows down: What makes the moving toy car slow down?

- A gravity pulling it sideways B light warming the surface
C sound pushing it forward D friction acting against its movement

2 Why a toy car slows down: What would most likely happen if there were very little friction?

- A The toy car would change colour. B The toy car would stop at once.
C The toy car would travel farther before stopping. D The toy car would become heavier.

Ava's guide to three kinds of fitness · Questions 13–18

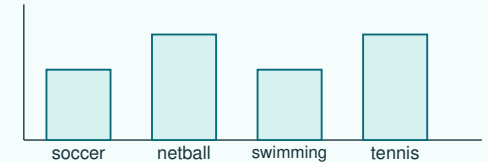

During a health lesson at the library, Ava's class learned that a sedentary person spends long periods sitting and moving very little. Regular activity helps the heart, muscles and joints. Review: Odd Animals · Questions 30–34Odd Animals by Tessa Green

This information book contains surprising facts, labelled pictures and short explanations. Its chapters move from simple examples to less familiar ones.
